INTRODUCTION

The originals of the accounts transcribed in these pages are to be found in a large parchment-bound volume, measuring $15\frac{3}{4}$ inches by 6 inches by $1\frac{7}{8}$ inches, at present in the library of Hooton Pagnell Hall. It begins in 1766-67 and contains the accounts of the Overseers of the Poor down to 1805-6, those of the Constables to 1817-18, and those of the Surveyors of the Highways down to 1818-19. The Churchwardens' accounts go on continuously until 1880, but they are the least interesting of all and it has not been thought worth while to carry the transcript beyond 1820.

[In an English parish in the eighteenth century, except in the case of certain persons statutorily exempt, every householder had to take his turn in serving one or more of the four offices with which we are here concerned. If he preferred not to serve himself he had to find a competent substitute, or he might compound by paying a fine. His term was for a year, but he had to continue his duties until his successor was appointed, and this might considerably lengthen his tenure.]

[Several cases are mentioned here of an official undertaking a second term. Except in the case of the churchwardens the duties of these offices were heavy and occupied a good deal of time; the holder might hope to recover his expenses, but he received no salary. By law the negligent or inefficient official might be fined or even imprisoned.]

[The frequency with which names are repeated seems to show that the business of Hooton Pagnell was very much in the hands of a small number of persons. The accounts are passed and signed with four or five often recurring signatures. This little group had almost made themselves into a club—a new member had to “pay his footing” (p. 13). The transaction of business must have had a neighbourly, not to say convivial aspect: “spent at a meeting” is quite a common entry. They were men of pretty much the same class: from the Parish Register we can discover some of their occupations.

They were chiefly farmers and tradesmen, and though Mr. Patientius Warde of Hooton Pagnell and Mr. Selwood Hewitt of Bilham took their turn, most of the actual work was done by someone else (p. 10). [The persons usually chosen as parish officials could read and write, but they employed a better educated person to draw up their accounts for them. As we come towards the later of these accounts we find them less well done, and there are some curious mistakes.]

[THE CHURCHWARDENS, chosen annually at the Easter vestry, were responsible for the care and repair of the nave (the lay rector was responsible for the chancel), and the upkeep of the church paths and the churchyard. They had to provide things necessary for the services, such as bread and wine for the Holy Communion (administered only three or four times a year), and occasionally a new Prayer Book (p. 14), or a surplice (p. 18). They paid the clerk, and the dog-whipper, whose duty it was to drive dogs out of the church. The singers received from them a small sum annually (p. 101), and we gather that there were musicians as well, for there is a frequent entry of money spent on bass strings (p. 113). The bells were always rung on the fifth of November and the ringers received a gratuity. Leather and ropes for the bells represent a frequent item of expenditure. The churchwardens paid £2 12s. 6d. for painting the list of benefactors and benefactions on a board to be hung up in the church (p. 24), and £1 11s. 6d. for "writing the creed" (p. 37). The church clock frequently needed repair. Occasionally we find them purchasing basses (stuffed kneelers or hassocks), as when in 1774 they bought six basses for the font (for the officiant, the clerk, the nurse and three godparents). On one occasion (p. 40) they paid fourpence for a "fillmart's" (i.e. a polecat's) head. In 1781 they bought 8 yards of garth welbing, or rather webbing (p. 33). This was a stout woven material such as was used for saddle girths and was probably used for lowering coffins into the grave. In 1770 they bought four quarts of linseed oil and blether—the latter defined in the English Dialect Dictionary as "any kind of liquid or semi-liquid substance, usually either dirty or disgusting." In 1783 they bought two gimmers (jointed hinges) for the Town Box (p. 40). The expenses of Holy Thursday (p. 122) are almost certainly in connexion with the beating of the bounds. One of the churchwardens' duties was to attend the arch-deacon's annual visitation, at which they were sworn in. The Book of Articles (p. 9) was the paper of enquiries sent round before the visitation. Unnecessary expenditure on eating and drinking frequently marked these occasions, and on 30th June, 1767, they decided that the cost must be limited to twenty-four shillings.

There are a few references to briefs, which were orders for collections for special purposes (e.g. p. 47), but the money seems to have been paid out of the general funds: we have, at any rate, no information to the contrary. By the rule of the church the alms at the Communion Service were for "pious and charitable uses," but these alms are not mentioned in this volume; in fact we have little or no reference to any source of income except the church rate, here called the assessment, levied on the parish by the vestry. A woman, Mrs. Wingfield, was churchwarden in 1803-4. We have no account of her receipts—only a statement of a balance in hand. Her appointment was not an innovation, for examples of women churchwardens are found as far back as the fifteenth century.

By the Statute of 43 Eliz., c. 2, every parish had to provide for its own poor and the duty was delegated to the churchwardens and OVERSEERS OF THE POOR. In process of time this business fell entirely into the hands of the overseers. In the eighteenth century these were chosen by the vestry, but received their appointment from two of more justices of the peace, and after their term of office was ended they submitted their accounts to these; but the audit was usually merely perfunctory. Among their duties was the provision of homes for the homeless, the payment of relief to the aged and impotent, the administration of lands, such as those at Pontefract and Darrington, or of money left for the poor, such as Mr. Marriott's dole, which was paid on or about St. Thomas's Day (p. 18). In these accounts we find them giving regular weekly doles, making occasional gifts of money, or paying a poor person's rent. One poor person was sometimes lodged with another, and money might be paid for nursing, for a doctor, or for a midwife. A parish might own or build a poorhouse, but at Hooton Pagnell several cottages were rented from the squire (p. 68), and several people lived in each cottage. This explains "one dozen of coals for A. Plummer, John Hoyle, Ann Godfrey senr"; "one dozen for A. Stacey, M. Firth, R Micklefit" (p. 47), and the reference "and Co" when the writer of the accounts gives the name of only one person out of the group. The overseers were responsible for orphans or deserted children. These were sometimes boarded out, it might be with people who were themselves receiving relief. On occasion the overseer might take such a child into his own house (p. 11). John Crossley, the schoolmaster, was paid annually for teaching four poor children (p. 18). When he was old enough the pauper child was apprenticed at the expense of the parish, and a well-known device was to apprentice him in another parish, so that he might get a settlement there.

Some of the poor people received allowances which supplemented their low wages, a common and vicious abuse of the time, enabling wages to be kept low. Several people in the following pages received money from the overseer of the poor and the overseer of the highways at the same time. The poor were encouraged to earn what money they could, hence the provision of implements for spinning and carding: "a new wheel for Mary Frost" (p. 36), "a worsit (worsted) reel" (p. 50), "a pair of cards" (p. 80), "two line (flax) wheels" (p. 99). We find the overseers providing furniture and such things: "bed stocks" or bed posts (the uprights of a wooden bedstead) "for Widow Ashley," and "seven yards of harding" (a coarse fabric made from the hards of flax or hemp) for a bed (pp. 23, 68), a washing panshion or earthenware pan, a range, a pillow, a posnil, or more properly a posnit, i.e. a small metal pot with a handle and three feet (p. 50).

The overseers paid for pauper funerals and even for a simple meal at such times. Medicine was provided for the sick:

“ brimstone and treacle for Amos ” (p. 100), one of the poor children, “ a daffy bottle ” (i.e. a bottle of “ Daffy’s Elixir,” a compound tincture of senna) for Ben Burgess (p. 42). We have several references to the gift of a strike (p. 14), or stroke (p. 12), or met (p. 16) of wheat, or blencorn (blend corn, mixed corn). The quantity in each case is a bushel. A strike (p. 129, or met (p. 26) of hair provided probably for mortar for church repairs seems also to be a bushel.

Coals were provided for the poor and there was a coal house or storehouse (p. 67). The overseers doled the coal out in corves, pulls or dozens, perhaps a dozen pulls or corves (pp. 50, 51). Corve (German Corb) was a flat basket for the conveyance of coal to the tramshaft. Not more than two generations ago some of the miners of south Durham carried coals in the summer time into north-west Yorkshire, in pulls or baskets carried on donkeys and mules, two pulls on a donkey, and four on a mule, each basket or pull containing about four stone. It seems probable, therefore, that the “ pull ” of wheat referred to in this volume must represent a similar quantity.

By 8 & 9, Will. III, c. 11, any person in receipt of parish pay had to wear on the right sleeve a badge of red or blue cloth bearing the letter “ P ” and the first letters of the name of the parish. To neglect or refuse this adornment would mean loss of parish pay and perhaps a visit to the house of correction. We have only one mention of this badge (p. 11).

By Statute 13 & 14, Car. II, c. 12, the overseers might remove, with a justice’s warrant, any persons coming to settle in the parish if they feared they might become chargeable to the parish. There was great anxiety to remove poor people to the parish of their settlement, thus casting the burden of their maintenance elsewhere. The settlement laws worked harshly on many people. They tended to prevent a man migrating to a place where he might be able to get a living. To remove a pauper, or possible pauper, it was necessary first to bring him before two justices to be examined on oath as to his last place of settlement. Casual labourers who came for a harvesting or hay-making job were expected to bring a certificate from their clergyman or a parochial official certifying the name of the parish and whether they had a dwelling or family there. A servant going from place to place had to bring certificates from his master and the parish officials testifying the destination and purpose of his journey. Only accredited strangers might receive casual relief.

Bastardy cases gave the overseers much trouble. By statute an order might be made by two justices that the reputed father should pay a weekly sum. The mother had to swear to the paternity before a justice and the putative father had to give security to save the parish from expense. Failing this he was liable to imprisonment. The overseers had frequent jaunts in pursuit of missing fathers, and the accounts showed that if they paid they did not pay very much, nor did they keep up their payments very long.

All this cost money, and the expenditure on the poor went up by leaps and bounds in the latter part of the eighteenth century, as these accounts show. Moreover, prices had risen rapidly. Some of the overseers were so lavish that by an Act of 1794 the consent of the vestry was required before the overseer could pay any relief, unless he already had a justice's order, for it was no unusual thing for a justice to order what the overseer should do in particular cases.

To provide funds the overseers were empowered to levy a poor rate. The order for the levy had to be approved and signed by at least two justices of the peace. In practice they did not refuse to sign or attempt to alter the assessment. There was no check on expenditure except public opinion and the capacity of the parish to pay for it. By Act 17, George II, c. 3, public notice of the rate to be levied had to be given in church. The overseer was an unpaid servant of the public, and if he rendered an account of expenditure and receipts and did not claim too much in the way of personal expenses no one made any complaint. Even such an entry as "For seeking I know what" (p. 111) seems to have passed muster with the parish meeting. The overseer had a thankless job and frequently in the vestry nominated his successor lest he should be left to bear the burden for another year.

Each parish was responsible for the upkeep of its highways. The office of OVERSEER or SURVEYOR OF HIGHWAYS was first established in 1555. The vestry or parish meeting supplied a suitable list of “the most sufficient inhabitants” of the parish to the justices, who then appointed the surveyor for the ensuing year. He had to inspect all the roads, bridges, watercourses and pavements, and to report upon their condition to the justices, from whom he obtained their consent to a suitable assessment or rate levied on the property owners. He had to see that people having property on the line of the highways kept their gutters clean and did not encroach on the road with their haystacks, manure heaps and so forth. Offenders received thirty days’ notice to make the necessary reforms or repairs, and if they failed to do so the surveyor took action himself at their expense. He had the right to demand six days’ personal service from each householder, who, however, could appoint a deputy or make a money commutation or composition which the overseer had to collect. He had to enforce all transport regulations issued by the Government. By an Act of 1766 he was obliged to present his accounts to the vestry for approval fifteen days before he produced them at the special Highway Sessions of the justices: but, of course, the chief check on his actions was public opinion. In a little community like Hooton Pagnell he would be careful not to demand an excessive rate: on the other hand there was the danger that he would be lax in his duty for fear of offending his friends. A woman, Mrs. Wingfield, was overseer of the highways of Hooton Pagnell in 1801–2.

In the surveyor of the highways accounts we find payment for “hacking in the road” (p. 10), with which we can compare an entry in the Doncaster highway accounts, “For hacking the ruts and letting out water 9s.”; for “baring” or stripping off turf and soil to enable the quarrymen to get at the stone, and for the erection of stoops—that is, wooden or stone posts (pp. 22, 25), or stoops and rails (p. 52). There are entries referring to laying a trunk and stone for a trunk (p. 6), laying two sows (p. 10), and walling the wall on the Town Gate. The Town Gate was the main street of the village. A trunk was a drain, and “stone for a trunk” implies that the drain was made by cutting a trench, putting in it a layer of broken stone some inches deep, and then covering in the trench again. This was called hollow draining. The “sow” was also a drain, channel, or run of water. We may compare the use of the word in iron smelting, in which a large trench called a sow serves as a feeder to the smaller channels or pigs. The North Field at Hooton Pagnell was one of the original three fields of the ancient system of agriculture. These fields were divided into strips, and the balks were the unploughed divisions between the strips. Hence the reference to “balking the North Field” (p. 25).

THE CONSTABLE, or Petty Constable, originally elected in the Court Leet, was in later times named by the vestry or parish meeting and appointed and sworn in by two justices. He had to be a respectable householder, and if he refused office he was liable to penalties, but he could provide a deputy. On one occasion, 1802–3, the constable of Hooton Pagnell was Mrs. Wingfield, but her accounts are not recorded. The constable attended Petty Sessions, Quarter Sessions, Brewster Sessions (p. 38), and the Assizes, executed writs and warrants issued by the justices, went to Doncaster to sign the Assize articles (p. 56), made presentment at Quarter Sessions of offenders and vagabonds in his parish, haled them to the nearest justice, kept them, if necessary, in safe custody, and was responsible for their appearance at the sessions. He had to enforce the law against all kinds of evil-doers, scolding wives, people, like Mary Micklefit, “guilty of false reeling” (p. 53), alehouse tipplers, and Sabbath breakers, as well as those guilty of major crimes. He might be required to administer punishments, and as we find several references to mending the stocks they were probably in frequent use (p. 66). At Quarter Sessions he might have to answer an indictment against his parish for some corporate infringement of the law. He collected land tax (p. 37) and window tax, house and servants’ duty (p. 30), and every year was responsible for making up the list of freeholders to serve on juries in his district. He dealt with strangers who came with passes—that is, licences signed by two justices of the peace, enabling the holders to receive relief in any parish through which they travelled. He swore in the pinder, the keeper of the pinfold in which stray cattle were impounded (pp. 102–103). The little pinfold of Hooton Pagnell still exists, though nowadays put to a different use.

In the accounts there are frequent references to the militia. In this national force every able-bodied man was by Common Law legally bound to serve, though in practice comparatively few were ever required to do so. During the Seven Years' War the militia were kept up to the necessary strength by ballot, and this was steadily enforced during the Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars, and there was great activity in this respect in the Doncaster district. So we get such entries as "Attending the militia meeting," "Going to Doncaster to swear the militia. Paid for eating and drinking and cockades 4s. 6d." (p. 19). Every year the constable went to Doncaster with the militia list—that is, the list of the names of persons qualified to serve in the militia—and a ballot was taken from these; but a person chosen might provide a substitute. Hence the entry "Going to Doncaster at the time of lotting," i.e. balloting (p. 78). During the war time he had business about the pioneers and the beacons (p. 110).

The constable's emblem of office was a staff, which was provided for him by the community, and was painted for him when necessary. A frequent entry is "Going to meet the chief." The Chief, or High Constable, was appointed for the hundred or wapentake by the justices in Quarter Sessions, originally for a year; but as time went on his term of service was frequently extended to three or more years, or even for life. He had to hand in at Quarter Sessions all the presentments of the petty constables within his jurisdiction. Among his duties was the levying of the county rate—that is to say, he had to enforce the precepts by which its due proportion of this rate was assigned to each parish. Each petty constable brought him his parochial quota, sometimes called here the estrate or estreat money, and the chief constable then handed over his total receipts to the County Treasurer or the Clerk of the Peace. It was noticed at the Suffolk Quarter Sessions in 1763 that several of the chief constables demanded a shilling from each petty constable on receiving his presentments and quota, and the magistrates forbade this practice. But the chief constable had increasing out-of-pocket expenses, and towards the end of the eighteenth century certain charges and expenses were customarily allowed. This explains the frequent shilling paid to the chief constable (p. 74).

The division between the duties of the various officials is not always clearly marked. We should have expected the surveyor of the highways would have gone to Doncaster about guide posts (p. 110), but it was the constable who went. The churchwardens paid for a polecat's head, but the constable was responsible for the mole-catcher (p. 52), and as there was "a meeting about the moles" (p. 128) in 1813, they had probably become a nuisance in that year. The constable also paid for sparrow heads (pp. 118, 128), but it was the overseer of the highways who paid for the rat-catching (p. 98).

Parliament in 1662 sanctioned a parish rate for the expenses of the petty constable and it was out of this rate that the "estreat money" was paid. By Statute (1606 and 1754) the constable was allowed certain fees, and the justices allowed him certain expenses. He had to present his accounts to the overseers of the poor and to the vestry. He had great powers in his hands; but generally, we may suppose, common sense came to his help. He was liable to the justices if he showed himself negligent, while on the other hand too great officiousness might make him very unpopular in his parish.

The accounts in this book deal with small matters, but are interesting inasmuch as they throw light on the common life of a village community in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.
